“Is “The Potlikker Papers” a history of the South by way of food stories, or a story about Southern food by way of our history?” wrote Wyatt Williams in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. “By the time you come to the end of this rigorous volume, you’ll know that the two are indivisible. Edge has long shaped the conversation about food not only in this region but across the country through his pulpit as director of the Southern Foodways Alliance. The Potlikker Papers is his defining contribution to that conversation.”

Edge is a contributing editor at Garden & Gun. For twenty-two years he served as a columnist for the Oxford American. For three years he wrote the monthly “United Taste” column for the New York Times. His magazine and newspaper work has been featured in eleven editions of the Best Food Writing compilation. He has won four James Beard Foundation Awards, including two M.F.K. Fisher Distinguished Writing Awards.

Edge earned an MA in Southern Studies from the University of Mississippi. And an MFA in Creative Nonfiction from Goucher College. He directs the Southern Foodways Alliance, an institute of the Center for the Study of Southern Culture at the University of Mississippi, where he documents, studies, and explores the diverse food cultures of the American South. The SFA has completed more than 1,000 oral histories and 100 films, focused on people like fried chicken cooks, row crop farmers, oystermen, and bartenders. Edge has written or edited more than a dozen books, including the foodways volume of the New Encyclopedia of Southern Culture. Edge has served as culinary curator for the weekend edition of NPR's "All Things Considered," and has been featured on dozens of television shows, from "CBS Sunday Morning" to "Iron Chef."

Edge lives in Oxford, Mississippi, with his son, Jess, and his wife, Blair Hobbs, a teacher, writer, and painter. Her website is www.blairhobbs.com.
